Q: Is it possible to undo the default iOS Control Center shortcut? Currently I use an app called TinyCircuits to enable the timer/stopwatch functionality. When I'm in an application in the normal way (not in the Control Center) and I want to start the timer, I have to go into TinyCircuits, choose the application, then long press the home button and choose the timer. Is there any way to set it so pressing the home button will open the app switcher and then choose the timer option? A: No. You cannot change this. This invention is directed to an apparatus for securely holding a swimsuit on the body of a wearer and to a novel swimsuit that can be removably secured to the apparatus. It is not uncommon for swimmers to wear a bathing suit of one kind or another during swimming and other recreational activities. Often, the swimmer wants to take the swimsuit off when the swimmer and surrounding environment are not very warm. The swimmer may leave the swimsuit on in a vehicle or boat or may keep the swimsuit in the vehicle or boat. If the swimmer takes the swimsuit off outside, the swimmer risks removing personal items and valuables from the swimsuit such as keys, cash, and credit cards. If the swimmer leaves the swimsuit in the vehicle or boat, the swimmer

Decapitation-induced hyperactivity (DIH) is a specific response to nociceptive stimuli that includes spontaneous firing of mediadorsal thalamic neurons. This response becomes evident when the rat gains new information about the head-direction (north/south) of the animal. We investigated the influence of learning about the head-direction on the activity of nucleus accumbens (NAc) neurons. In anesthetized rats, seven days after the rats had learned which direction was north, the activity of NAc neurons was recorded during right and left tail-pinch stimulations. We found that virtually all NAc neurons (56/60) were more active during tail-pinch compared to control stimulations. Among NAc neurons that changed firing rate significantly, 32/35 neurons showed a significantly greater activity during tail-pinch stimulations when the rats had learned which direction was north. NAc neurons that fire more during tail-pinch stimulations after learning about the head-direction differ from neurons that fire more during tail-pinch before learning about the head-direction. They differ with respect to their firing rate, type of response, and response latency. These data are discussed with respect to the interpretation of DIH as a passive or active response. The data are also discussed with respect to ascending control of nociceptive information to different brain regions.Q: Can I do a double-transfer in this scenario? Let's say I have a counterparty that has a no-interest free loan to me. Is it possible to give a letter of credit in this case? Would I be able to give one of those to the f678ea9f9e
